This will be one of the main themes of the firm's annual report and conference, which opens today in London. The report by Edward Simons, ICM's managing director, will be made at its annual conference, which starts today in London, and the theme was specifically chosen to counter the "elephant in the room" that is Brexit. As the Brexit negotiations proceed, it is more and more likely that the UK will end up leaving the EU without a deal; and according to the forecast from ICM's sister firm, IMRG, there are about 1,000 such events that could destabilise the economy. "These could create a political shockwave, and we need to be ready for them," said Simons. "We know the Brexit decision has been driven by short-term economic interests, and many commentators are calling for the UK to do a 'no deal' Brexit, which would destroy the business model of many in the PR industry. But it is also important to recognise that the majority of the UK economy is based around services, and the biggest threat to our economy is still the possibility of no Brexit at all – and that's when the political divide comes back to haunt us." This could lead to a situation where "it's the companies looking after the economy that are working against the interests of workers, and we need to unite to turn the tables." With this in mind, the report calls on the PR industry to "form a new progressive alliance", with the focus on using PR to achieve a softer Brexit and to promote greater workforce rights and better education and 55cdc1ed1c
